Assessing the ambiguous status of tribal leaders and other traditional authorities under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act

By Barak Cohen, Esq., and T. Markus Funk, Esq. Perkins Coie

One of the many definitional challenges facing Foreign Corrupt Practices Act practitioners worldwide is whether and under what circumstances traditional authorities, such as tribal leaders, qualify as "foreign officials" under the FCPA.<sup>1</sup>

This is a particularly apt question because the Justice Department has increased the number of enforcement actions involving developing countries where traditional authorities routinely exercise considerable influence over social, familial and business matters.

While surprisingly little has been said or written on this topic, past analysis has tended to conclude that traditional authorities should by default be treated as "foreign officials" even with respect to payments tied to the application of their ex officio authority.

This cautious advice is familiar to those accustomed to wading the murky waters of the FCPA.

However, recent developments, including broad Justice Department guidance, persuade us that it is time for a nuanced assessment of this increasingly commonplace challenge.

EXAMINING THE DEFINITION OF 'FOREIGN OFFICIAL'

As at least one court and numerous lawyers have noted, the FCPA is no model of clarity.<sup>2</sup> For example, its anti-bribery provisions define a "foreign official" as:

[A]ny officer or employee of a foreign government or any department, agency, or instrumentality thereof, or of a public international organization, or any person acting in an official capacity for or on behalf of any such government or department, agency, or instrumentality, or for or on behalf of any such public international organization.<sup>3</sup>

So where do traditional authorities such as tribal leaders fit under this string of words? Neither the plain language nor the FCPA's legislative history address this question. Nor have the FCPA's enforcers offered an explanation of the law's reach that might help clarify who qualifies as a foreign official.

In the absence of clear language or guidance, courts are left to treat such issues as questions of fact dependent on multiple factors.<sup>4</sup>

Indeed, the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission recently released FCPA guidance that is silent on the issue of the status of traditional authorities, such as tribal leaders. This signals continued reliance on an expansive (some would say largely untethered) definition of "foreign official."

According to the FCPA's twin enforcers, "the [act] broadly applies to corrupt payments to 'any' officer or employee of a foreign government to those acting on the foreign government's behalf," which includes "low-ranking employees and high-level officials alike." Such a broad proclamation offers scant comfort to practitioners tasked with providing clients nuanced analysis regarding the FCPA's application to difficult-to-categorize figures such as tribal leaders.

Perhaps the best guidance the Justice Department has yet offered on this question is found in a Sept. 18, 2012, "opinion release" concerning the hiring of a member of a royal family of an undisclosed foreign country as a consultant to a U.S. company doing business in that country.

The royal family member, who held no position in his country's government, was hired, among other things, to introduce the U.S. company to the foreign country's embassy, advise the company on cultural-awareness issues in dealing with the country's officials and businesses, and to identify business opportunities in the country.

The Justice Department opined that "the royal family member does not qualify as a foreign official ... so long as the royal family member does not directly or indirectly represent that he is acting on behalf of the royal family or in his capacity as a member of the royal family."<sup>6</sup>

The Justice Department further observed that "[a] person's mere membership in the royal family of the foreign country, by itself, does not automatically qualify that person as a 'foreign official." Rather, "the question requires a fact-intensive, case-by-case determination" turning on various factors:

- The structure and distribution of power within a country's government.
- A royal family's current and historical legal status and powers.

Barak Cohen (L), a senior counsel in Perkins Coie's white-collar and investigations practice, previously served as a prosecutor with the Justice Department. He can be reached at bcohen@perkinscoie. com. T. Markus Funk (R), a partner in the firm's white-collar and investigations practice, is a former Chicago assistant U.S. attorney, Justice Department resident legal adviser in Kosovo and founding co-chair of the American Bar Association's global anti-corruption committee. He can be reached at mfunk@perkinscoie.com.

- The individual's position within the royal family.
- An individual's present and past positions within the government.
- The mechanisms by which an individual could come to hold a position with governmental authority or responsibilities (such as royal succession).
- The likelihood that an individual would come to hold such a position.
- An individual's ability, directly or indirectly, to affect governmental decision-making.
- Numerous other factors.<sup>8</sup>

This method of determination suggests how the Justice Department is likely to assess the status of traditional authorities in the future. Courts, left with little lawmaker guidance, no doubt will follow suit.

The enforcers can also be expected to look for evidence of connections between a foreign government and a leader's tribe.

For example, prosecutors in United States v. Esquenazi obtained the conviction on FCPA charges of a defendant who allegedly paid bribes to the employees of a Haitian telecommunications company partially owned and purportedly controlled by the Haitian government in exchange for credits and reduced rates.<sup>9</sup> (In the follow-up trial, the government changed tack and described the defendants as extortion victims.)

The legal theory underlying the conviction was that the bribed employees equated to "foreign officials." As evidence, prosecutors and the trial court pointed to the Haitian government's allegedly close relationship with the company.

Since the conviction is currently on appeal to the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, it is possible that this aggressive definition of "foreign official" will ultimately fail.<sup>10</sup>

In the interim, however, it is likely the government will rely on similar theories to argue that tribes administered or subsidized by their governments are mere proxies and that tribal leaders are therefore "foreign officials" for purposes of the FCPA's anti-bribery provisions.

Comparison with the law regarding bribery of domestic public officials reinforces this position.

In United States v. Boots, the 1st Circuit considered the status of officials of American Indian tribes with respect to domestic bribery statutes.<sup>11</sup> The court held that an official of Maine's Passamaquoddy Tribe qualified as a "public servant" under local bribery law because relevant state legislation treated American Indian tribes as the approximate equivalents of municipalities.<sup>12</sup> Thus, each tribe's officials qualified as "public servants" to the same extent that would be true of officials of a city or town.<sup>13</sup>

Although imperfect, the analogy between tribal leaders under the FCPA and officials of American Indian tribes is apt in the Boots case. Whether the enforcers and courts will draw on such an analogy in their efforts to identify "foreign officials" under the FCPA remains to be seen.

If they do, the result would reinforce a functional approach to assessing whether a tribal leader is operating as a foreign official. This functional approach would pivot on whether the leader exercises authority based on local law, traditional or ceremonial status, or his or her role as a community adviser.

ASSESSING 'FOREIGN OFFICIAL' STATUS OF TRIBAL CHIEFS

Setting aside the broader systemic and due process question of the government forcing the public to read the legal tea leaves, we suggest some factors to consider in assessing whether a traditional authority such as a tribal leader potentially qualifies as a foreign official under the FCPA:

- Government membership/agency: Does the traditional authority hold him/ herself out as a member of, or agent for, the foreign government, whether at the national, regional, provincial or municipal level?
- Government-granted privileges or obligations: What are the traditional authority's privileges and obligations under applicable local law?
- Formal/actual status: What is the traditional authority's formal and de facto status?
- "Employee": Can the traditional authority be said to be an employee of a state-owned or controlled entity or otherwise connected to a foreign official?
- Functions: Does the traditional authority perform purely ceremonial functions or is he or she empowered to perform

- traditional governmental functions (such as officiating at marriages, adjudicating land and other disputes, etc.)?
- Discretionary authority: Is the traditional authority's permission or approval required by law (or in practice) in order to obtain permits, concessions or rights from the foreign government?
- Compensation: How does the traditional authority earn, and from whom is the compensation received?
- Tribe subsidized or administered by government: Does a foreign government subsidize or administer the tribe or other traditional community?

CONCLUSION

Those looking for a bright-line rule allowing for predictable outcomes will be unsatisfied by the foregoing. Regrettably, definitive answers are in short supply. At a minimum, the reader is now armed with relevant questions to ask, the answers to which will help you provide your client with intelligent advice.

NOTES

- <sup>1</sup> 5 U.S.C. § 78dd-1.
- <sup>2</sup> See United States v. Kay, 359 F.3d 738, 744 (5th Cir. 2004) (acknowledging the FCPA's "ambiguity").
- <sup>3</sup> 15 U.S.C. § 78dd-2(h)(2)(A).
- <sup>4</sup> See, e.g., United States v. Carson, No. SACR 09-00077-JVS, 2011 WL 5101701, *3-4 (C.D. Cal. May 18, 2011) (holding that "the question of whether state-owned companies qualify as instrumentalities under the FCPA is a question of fact," and articulating non-exhaustive factors).
- <sup>5</sup> A Resource Guide to the U.S. Foreign Corrupt Practices Act (2012), at 20, available at http:// www.justice.gov/criminal/fraud/fcpa/guide.pdf.
- Opinion Procedure Release No. 12-01 at 1 (emphasis added).
- <sup>7</sup> Id. at 5 (emphasis added).
- <sup>8</sup> Id.
- <sup>9</sup> United States v. Esquenazi, No. 1:09-cr-21010-JEM-1 (S.D. Fla. Oct. 25, 2011).
- <sup>10</sup> In the interest of full disclosure, note that co-author Funk was lead appellate counsel representing Joel Esquenazi pro bono before the 11th Circuit. Funk, however, was not involved in Esquenazi's trial.
- <sup>11</sup> See United States v. Boots, 80 F.3d 580 (1st Cir. 1996), overruled in part by Pasquantino v. United States, 544 U.S. 349 (2005).
- <sup>12</sup> Id. at 590-91.
- <sup>13</sup> Id.