Regulating Greenhouse Gas Leakage: How California Can Evade the Impending Constitutional Attacks

This article, which was recently published in The Electricity Journal, examines California's greenhouse gas proposals in the electricity context and argues that many of the proposals are unconstitutional. Fortunately, however, this is not the end of the story. After dissecting the constitutional issues, the Article reveals how California, as well as other states, can potentially usurp the constitutional pitfalls - taking them completely out of play - by adding one critical step to their proposals.
